What is supported employment?

Supported employment means you work in a supportive work environment. This means there are people to help you do your job.

All over Australia there are Disability Enterprises. They employ people with disability. More than 20,000 Australians with disability work in Disability Enterprises.

Disability Enterprises do a lot of different things, and there are lots of jobs on offer. These include jobs as gardeners, store people, screen printers, recyclers, cooks and more.

Why is it a good idea to work in supported employment?

There are lots of reasons to work in supported employment.

You will earn money, or a wage. You will be able to have holidays and sick leave. You will be supported to learn new skills and achieve new things. You might even become a team leader.

You will work in a supportive environment and make new friends. You can use supported employment as a stepping-stone to help you get other work.

Is supported employment part of the NDIS?

Yes, supported employment is part of the NDIS. When you do your NDIS planning, you can decide that work is a goal for you and you can ask for supported employment to be in your NDIS plan.

Will this affect my disability support pension?

Most people who work in supported employment get a disability support pension. The wage you earn at work will be an extra amount – It will go on top of what you already get from your disability support pension.
